Employees want to know what their company's policies are when it comes to time off, especially paid time off (PTO). Is there any compensation for time away from work? How long do you think it will take? What can you do with it? The list of questions goes on and on, and while some of them are simple to answer, some are more difficult.

WHAT'S THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN VACATION AND PTO?

The main distinction between the two is that PTO refers to paid time off taken with or without family, whereas vacation time refers to paid time off taken for the employee to take a break with or without their family.

What we mean is that company (and state) rules differ on whether or not they pay out for "earned but unused" PTO. If an employee leaves, are you reimbursing them for any hours they have accrued but not used? Employers in Pennsylvania, for example, are not required to pay this leave unless it is specifically stated in the employee handbook.

Employers who provide vacation days will almost always provide sick days as well. This implies you'll have to deal with two different accruals, plus you'll need to figure out WHY the employee is asking for the time off. Is the employee ill, or is the employee's child ill? Does it make a difference? When compared to PTO, there are fewer records to keep overall. When deciding between vacation time, sick time, or PTO, your company's needs and goals must be considered.

Both methods have merits, but PTO appears to be the more popular alternative. Paid time off essentially gives employees complete freedom over how they spend their days, whether it's for leisure or something personal like sickness or a mental health day, without making them feel guilty for taking a sick day when they simply need a break because they've used up all of their vacation time.
