Are you here looking for compatibility between your granite worktop kitchen and flush-mounted hobs? We can notice the use of flush-mount appliances in almost every part of interior design in recent years. Homeowners of today prefer everything from kitchen worktops to appliances that add a sleek look to their interiors. Considering the same, in a kitchen, induction hobs have been replacing gas as the primary burner in British kitchens as better electrically heated alternatives have emerged. They thus have been trying to become less visible and less noticeable. As mentioned earlier, one of the very best in sleek looks is flush-mounting. When a kitchen hob is flush fitted, the base around the hob slips into a small notch carved out of the worktop, levelling the topmost, glass heating plate with the surrounding worktop.

Flush Fitted Hobs in Kitchen

Not just induction and ceramic hobs can be given a recessed look. Although they may have started the craze, gas stoves with glass plates may also be given a flush-fitted job on your marble and granite worktop kitchen these days. So, three popular picks for flush mounting are:

- Ceramic Hobs
- Induction Hobs
- Glass Plate Hobs

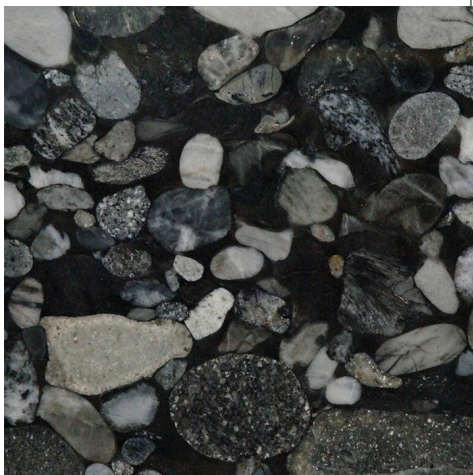

Which Worktops for Recessed Hobs?

Having a recessed or flush-fitted hob is a fantastic way to have a sophisticated look without going broke. In the recent few years, recessed hobs have soared in demand. Although they can be installed on any countertop type, we advise installing them on stone countertops made of quartz, granite, or marble. So if you have a granite worktop kitchen, quartz kitchen, quartzite or marble kitchen, you are good to go.

Does Flush Mounting a Stove Have any Drawbacks?

Like many trends promoted by designers, flush-mount hobs may sound greater in a display than they would in a real kitchen. Three straightforward reasons why flush-fitting a hob is not readily chosen are:

It is Pricy

Flush fitting a hob can be quite expensive. The cost of any kind of stone countertop will vary depending on a number of criteria. The amount of labour necessary is one of the above criteria. Therefore, the cost will increase when more polishing and channelling are needed. The installation of a low-profile hob flange requires the creation of a steep groove, which is a complicated and time-taking task. Therefore, if you'd like this functionality, it will probably cost more.

It Can Look Messy If Done Carelessly

The fitter must leave an expansion space around the hobs because they all have the potential to become warm. Science has long shown that although cold causes items to contract, heat causes them to stretch. Your burner operates similarly. In order to accommodate this enlargement, you must leave a space if your hob is flush-mounted. Naturally, this entails sealing the space with silicone to prevent the entry of contaminants. In some situations, this can be really unattractive. Even silicone can become soiled with time, necessitating removal and replacement with a brand-new one.

It Needs a Professional for Installation

As we are now aware of the complications around it, installing flush-fitted hobs on your granite worktop kitchen is not a single-handed job. It requires a professional for fitting.

Flush-Fitted Hob in Kitchen - Conclusion

As we have completed the article it is safe to conclude it by saying that even while flush-mounted hobs are generally not a bad choice for your quartz, marble or granite worktop kitchen, if you have limited expenditure or don't like the notion of silicone-filled gaps, they may not be the best option for you. Many customers continue to select this feature because they do have a streamlined, contemporary appearance. Personal taste is ultimately what matters. Contact Work-tops.com for Worktop Installation
