

Even though Avengers: Endgame is the culmination of a lengthy Infinity Saga of 22 movies, many believed (logically?) The blockbuster would also serve as a conclusion to what is called the "phase 3" of Marvel Studios, and that Spider-Man: Far From Home would be the opening of Stage 4 the following summer. It is not.

Kevin Feige has indeed clarified in a meeting: Avengers: Endgame won't be the end of the stage 3, but the next movie dedicated to the Weaver:" [Spider-Man: Far From Home] is the end of stage 3 you're the first to whom I state it. So, it's simple to see why Feige along with his teams deny any official communication about the future of the MCU so long as Endgame along with Far From Home are out, so perhaps to present an overall plan for next five years (knowing that the X-Men are not included that a priori ).

Spider-Man: With Far From Home coming out in the start of July, it's a safe bet the 2019 SDCC will be the perfect chance for Marvel Studios to direct the way with its own aims for the huge screen. Just wait a couple of days (such as Endgame ) and a few months (for Far From Home ) to see stage 3 end in the cinema - awaiting the huge Blu-Ray / DVD boxes to the end of the year. 'Year.
