

Using Las Vegas Wrongful Death Attorney as Legal Support

In a traditional attorney/client relationship, a client hires an attorney to take care of a legal problem and then hands over all responsibility for—and control over—the matter to the lawyer. Though some clients like it this way, many would rather be more involved in their cases, both to maintain some control and to save money on legal fees. But until recently, limited legal help from a lawyer wasn't much of an option. Most Las Vegas wrongful death attorney wouldn't take cases unless they could handle them fully on their own.

A new model of legal services has finally emerged. In this approach, sometimes called "legal coaching" or "unbundled legal services," a lawyer provides only the services that a client wants and nothing more. For example, a client who wants legal help in documentation or filing for the wrongful death case, then he or she could contact the lawyer and get legal help from the lawyer and then fax it to the lawyer, who will review it and suggest changes. Or a client who wants to represent him or herself in small claims court can use a lawyer to help draft motions and prepare for hearings, but otherwise pursue the case alone. For the personal injury victim or wrongful death client using a lawyer as a coach can be especially useful. More often than not the legal issues that arise in the course of personal injury, accident or wrongful death are relatively simple, and—with a bit of good legal advice—most businesspeople can handle them fairly easily.

Many times, client needs nothing more than some guidance through the various legal procedures, documentations and other reasons. For instance, a person who met an accident and suffered injury, then he or she can contact the lawyer to get legal support than completely hiring him or her for the personal injury claim. Rather than hiring an attorney for upwards of 1,000 dollars to deal with the problem, using a coach might cost 50 dollars and enable the client to proceed alone. Despite the good sense of this approach, it still can take some effort to find a Las Vegas wrongful death attorney who is willing to be just a coach. To find a legal coach, use the same strategies discussed above (personal referrals, for example) but take the extra step of asking the lawyer directly whether he or she is willing to help client in his or her efforts to solve his or her own legal problems. If client don't find one right away, be persistent.

It is important to get legal advice and support in cases like wrongful death from the best lawyer.
