

Lakers, San Antonio, Paul on Potential Destinations

The future of the veteran point guard is drawing attention.

According to reporter Mark Stein of The Stein Line, the hanging battery of Golden State Warriors' 'CP3' Chris Paul (Guard, 183 cm, 79 kg) is being discussed.

Reporter Stein also mentioned the possibility of Paul going to San Antonio at the end of April. This time, in addition to San Antonio, the Lakers were added.

This is a natural step. It is highly likely that Golden State will not guarantee Paul's upcoming 2024-2025 season salary, as he is expected to earn a whopping $30 million next season. However, if he is let go at the end of June due to unwarranted conditions, his contract could be terminated. If he comes to the market, he will most likely head to a club where he can challenge himself for a championship or a place where he can play a lot.

Hence, the Lakers and San Antonio are being mentioned. LeBron James is on the Lakers. James, who is far from winning the championship, is in the position of James, who is very close to winning the championship. He has not decided yet whether James will stay or not, but if he does, there is a possibility that he will head to Hollywood. He could also get some opportunity to play.

San Antonio is far from winning the championship. However, it can seek a bigger contract. San Antonio is looking for an experienced point guard. If it secures Paul, it will effectively seek the best guard that can save Victor Wembenyama. Paul has clearly saved Tyson Chandler, De'Andre Jordan (Denver), Clint Capella (Atlanta), and De'Andre Ayton (Portland).

Although he is now far from his prime, he is entering the twilight of his career. However, as much as his passing sense and management are still there, Wembleyama should be saved. Not only that, but he is also able to lead a young player based on his experience and leadership. San Antonio, which hopes to strengthen its team before jumping ship, deserves to actively jump into recruiting Wembley.

However, there are other possibilities. The odds are extremely low, but Golden State could guarantee him his salary and trade him. Or, it could find the possibility of joining Paul without re-signing Clay Thomson. In any case, moving to the Lakers or San Antonio would be practically difficult if the deal was guaranteed.

After Golden State guarantees Paul's contract, it could trade him to the Lakers for San Antonio. However, the Lakers do not have a trade card. San Antonio has no reason to send a prospect. Above all, it has to guarantee Paul's salary and secure his immediate strength if it trades. There is no reason to send him to San Antonio.
