Many scientists are engaged in research of gambling, and poker as well. Those who believed that he was a bad habit did not remain at all. The researchers measured the level of Fold in poker with two aces of cortisol (stress hormone) in the players' body, and came to the conclusion that during the game of poker, its level significantly decreased. This is explained by the fact that this is a game not for good luck, but for skill. When the brain begins to concentrate on what is happening, the person forgets all his everyday problems that bother him. When regular games are distracted even more, giving rest to your nervous system. This is more effective than computer games or watching TV, because when playing poker, a player learns what brain training does. The more regularly a person plays poker, the more he notes that the outcome of events can always be influenced by calculating each turn. This develops logic, patience, confidence, and other similar useful skills. Experienced players admit that poker helps them in life situations. For example, when choosing a large purchase or a car, place of work, investing a large amount of money into something. They already have the experience to make a mistake, but they are not afraid of it. Behind a bad decision always comes the good that is called feedback. After a few "no", a multiple "yes" follows. The main thing is to learn patience to experience losses, both in the game and in life. A negative experience is also an experience that, with the right conclusions, moves a person forward.

About 389Poker:
