

When to Contact Roofing Contractors for Inspection Services

The National Roofing Contractors Association recommends checking your roof at least twice of year—fall and spring when the weather tends to be milder—to help spot any problems. Your roof is one of the most important aspects of your home. It is comparable to the skin of your house; it's the first line of defense. It protects you and your family from storms, rain, sleet, snow, the sun, and more. However, when you neglect your roof, expensive problems can occur and even lead to replacing the entire roof. At the very minimum, negligence will mean costly energy bills and reoccurring damage control. This is why it's essential to have regular roof inspections. The sooner a problem is diagnosed, the easier it is to repair.

If you have missing shingles, or if your shingles are cracked, curling at the corners or edges or look “bald” because they're missing granules, repairing them can save you big bucks. You should call a professional roof inspector to check out how bad the damage is.

If you know what to look for, you may be able to do these inspections yourself. However, if you aren't sure, it is always best to call in the professionals.

When you do self-inspections, it is easy to overlook existing problems if you are not trained to see problems. If you find anything wrong, you will still need to hire a contractor to make the necessary repairs: <http://integrityroofingaz.com/contact-us/>
