Never let this three letter word disappear from your life, always make sure to ask when in doubt. This will most-likely prove to become one of one's greatest assets on your own long academic quest.

Always ask your professor about things that may be uncertain to you, but only and I repeat, only if this is crucial and important for your particular program and only if it is very relevant to the niche. Keep in mind that university/college teachers are individuals too, I understand it's difficult to understand, and they too hate it when hundreds of unnecessary questions are posed.

Only ask oneself how many times you have acquired certain essential items of information via a question, if you really want to know the significance of a good question. Visiting found it maybe provides cautions you could use with your father. Probably, this must have occurred hundreds of times, hence my advice to you is:

Don't hesitate to present a question when you are certain it is both important and highly relevant to the topic. Also, don't make your issue noise sophisticated just to be taken as sophisticated from the delegates, your asking because you want a solution perhaps not on account of personal confidence. Finally, I would want to end with some words I heard from the dean at Harvard a little while ago:

A Question ends with a Question mark

It sounds so simple yet so many individuals tend to neglect this. I've to state, folks are greatly frustrated by long winded comments are made by those who underneath the cover of a issue. This is often seen on arguments or at other types of public speakings, for those who have a question, make certain it ends with a question mark! I hope you understood that, didn't you?.
