When a person dies and has assets, including real estate, bank accounts, personal property, or investments left behind, it is often necessary for a person to go through the probate process to transfer the deceased's assets. However, some states do not require probate. Instead, the Probate Judge decides which strategies apply to a dead person's estate and enforces these rules. The judge presides over a public court and makes decisions according to state statutes.

It also includes federal law; sometimes, there are assets subject to federal probate laws.
