3 COMMON TYPES OF DEFECTS IN PRODUCTS LIABILITY CASES

In product liability cases, there are many different types of defects that can occur. Some of the most common include manufacturing defects, design defects, and problems with labeling or instructions.

MANUFACTURING DEFECTS

These are flaws that occur during the manufacturing process, resulting in a product that is not up to standards. Manufacturing defects can occur in any type of product, from food to electronics. They can happen due to a variety of reasons, such as poor quality control or using subpar materials.

DESIGN DEFECTS

A design defect is an error in the design of a product that makes it unreasonably dangerous to use. This could be anything from a flaw in the structure of a building to a malfunctioning component in a car. Design defects can have devastating effects, and they're something that we need to be aware of in order to avoid them.

WARNING DEFECTS

A warning defect is a type of error that can occur during software development. It occurs when the programmer fails to properly check for potential errors in the code. This can lead to unexpected behavior or results, and can often be difficult to debug.

Product defects can take many different forms, and it's important to understand the most common types in order to be prepared if you ever find yourself involved in a products liability case.
