Many different cultures have contributed over the years to the standard that has become modern American cinema today. For example, the history of Hispanic culture has made an indelible imprint on the entertainment that is Hispanic in origin, and this culture has also greatly impacted American film over the decades. Unique obstacles were overcome in Mexican cinema, such as the limited resources and technical knowledge for film production that had been available; resources more easily obtained by filmmakers of other nations. Original solutions became a part of the Mexican film process, and these adaptations to filmmaking have become something of a particular working style that is special to the Hispanic film community.

Twenty Thousand Leagues Under The Sea (1954) There's been many a filmed version of "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under The Sea", but the classic Disney romp co-starring James Mason (North By Northwest) and Kirk Douglas (Spartacus) is one of the most effective and plain fun. It also wonderfully juggles scenes of Captain Nemo's Nautilus terrorizing the luxury and navy ships of the time with a pure spectacle, beauty and majesty of undersea exploration. When the Nautilus is attacked by the giant squid, we're fully enmeshed in a world that owes all its foundation to water, and can 't quite imagine ever going back to land - at least forever unchanged.
