Should you be who are old enough to consider the first days of computer gaming you understand there was lots of great games that have been fun as a result of exceptional gameplay and not simply the graphics. Gaming started to become more popular in the 90s once people started buying computers. In early 90s games like Maniac Mansion, X-com 1, and Civilization were extremely hot for their addictive unique gameplay. Today gaming is mainstream and marketed towards a mass audience. As a way to industry to everyone, many games today focus on the graphics and effects as an alternative to unique gameplay. The truth is many games that are carbon copies of each other with slightly different twists.

These days, a lot of games think of yourself as as realistic as is possible and also have the most textures and polygons jammed into wow the eyes. As a way to market to everyone, many games nowadays pinpoint the graphics and tricks rather than unique gameplay. While there is nothing wrong with a game with beautiful graphics, when the novelty with the graphics expires, the gameplay is what keeps you playing. You see many games that seem to be carbon copies of one another with slightly different twists. There are a few games like Halo 2 the location where the developers obviously spent lots of time fine tuning to make sure the gameplay was as enjoyable as you can. With Halo 2, both the things that provide it with an advantage in my opinion would be the fact the movement of players is slower than most games and the weapons are highly balanced. Also, rather than throwing a great deal of multiplayer maps on the player, the developers centered on making a small selection of of quality maps.

Freeware games are a possibility for people with a small budget who value gameplay over graphics. A freeware game is just a game that is free without having fees attached. Freeware developers usually lack the big 3d engines to run their games so they must increase the risk for games as fun as they possibly can without all of the features of retail games. These developers make games only for the romance of developing them and quite often produce some unique and quality games which can be worth an appearance. Especially due to the fact these games are completely free. These games span all the categories of retail games from Massively Multiplayer to 3d First Person Shooter. Some companies also release production quality games as freeware given that they decide never to put the game into production or as promotion.
