There have always been believers in spiritual healing, which has roots in the Bible. It has greatly increased in popularity in recent years in the United States, the United Kingdom, and other nations. Spiritual healers hold that the therapeutic effect comes about as a consequence of the patient receiving healing "energy" that has been channeled via the healer from an assumed source. The main claim of healers is that they encourage or assist the patient's own healing. The presence of this "energy," however, is not backed by any scientific data, and neither are the theories that underpin spiritual healing.
