Web development means building a website. It varies from a plain static HTML website or a full-blown complex web-based application. It's mainly about programming to build web pages or applications that can run in any web browser. It is divided into two categories: front end and back end. Generally, the front end is user-focused, with everything which you can see on a website. Whereas the back end is the server of the website which makes sure that the site works.

In big organizations and businesses, a web development team is made up of more than just web developers. It may include a web engineer, designer, content developer, and client liaison.
