

How to choose the best kitchen tiles

Whether you are remodelling your kitchen or designing a new one, picking the best kitchen tiles is crucial. They'll shield work surfaces on walls, especially those behind the stove and the splashback, and they make attractive, durable, and easy-to-clean kitchen flooring. To help you choose the ideal kitchen tiles for your space, we've examined all the possibilities below.

There is a vast selection of tiles that are appropriate for kitchen floors and walls. The choice with the lowest cost and easiest maintenance are man-made tiles. You can build a scheme you adore by using various designs and colours, either plain or patterned, and a variety of finishes. Although more expensive, natural stone is a beautiful and unique option. Stone tiles require more meticulous maintenance than man-made ones, but if you follow the guidelines, you can keep stone looking great.

NATURAL STONE KITCHEN TILES

For kitchen walls and floors, consider using marble, limestone, travertine, and slate. Keep in mind that natural stone needs to be sealed to protect it and should only be cleaned with chemicals made specifically for stone; regular household cleaners are too abrasive. Natural stone tiles can be finished with polished, smooth, modern honed, or aged-looking tumbled surfaces.

There are remarkable dark and coloured variations of marble in addition to the more common grey and white tones. Similar to veining, veining can be subtle or obvious. Never install glossy marble in a kitchen because it presents a slip danger. A lot of limestone is available. Its beige, grey, cream, and dark colours allow for a wide variety of aesthetics. The durability of limestones might vary, so if you're using it as a floor, make sure the stone is robust enough for a space with high activity.

Although there are also warmer tones, beige and grey are the most common colours for travertine. Natural voids exist on the surface, which are filled either by most finishes or by grouting the tiles. Slate produces a rough surface that might improve foothold at floor level or provide character to a kitchen wall. Slate is a striking stone because of its deep, rich colours.

MAN MADE KITCHEN TILES

There is a vast selection of ceramic and porcelain tiles for the kitchen, and you can be precise in producing the finish you want thanks to colour, pattern, the appearance of stone or wood, and different finishes. Glass tiles increase the variety even more. For the kitchen, ceramic tiles might be a remarkably economical option. Some of them aren't appropriate for the floor, but they're perfect for walls. When purchasing, make sure to check because a tile designed just for walls won't withstand the wear and tear of a busy room like the kitchen. Ceramic tiles are easy to clean and don't require sealing. Because porcelain tiles are fired at a greater temperature and have a higher density than ceramic tiles, they are exceptionally durable.

Although they are also available in other wall tile styles, glass tiles are frequently used in mosaics. They can create a spectacular focal point by using options like multicoloured glass mosaics, which will give additional shine to a kitchen. If you want to make the kitchen appear brighter, choose wall tiles with a gloss surface because they reflect light. If you're planning a small kitchen, they can be an excellent purchase to help make it appear larger. They are very simple to clean. Flat is the finish of matte tiles. They won't be as noticeable as a gloss version that catches the light, but they can be a terrific way to add subtle contrast with other kitchen surfaces in, say, an all-white scheme. They might require a little additional cleaning.
