The usual customer profile for sole representative visa advisers in Delhi is a businessman looking to test the request conditions in the United Kingdom before deciding to make the plunge with a business expansion move. Still, the sole representative visa does feed to another kind of purpose too. We're talking about intelligencers working for media houses taking staying in the UK for extended ages of time for a particular assignment (like in order to cover the Olympics, etc).

Representatives of overseas journals, news agencies, and other broadcasting associations are entitled to stay in the UK for an extended time period under a sole representative (sole rep) visa. A Sole rep visa can be used by further than one representative of an overseas media company to be present in the UK at the same time.

What if your journalism assignment is taking longer than planned?

Still, does that mean you have to leave your assignment deficient and return home? No, say our sole representative visa advisers in Delhi, If your journalism assignment is taking longer than you or your media company intended.

In case of special scripts, a particular event of journalistic interest can go on longer than intended. For illustration, if a intelligencer is in the UK on a sole rep visa in order to cover a new political movement, there's a chance that he finds out he must stay longer in order to cover a significant event. In similar scripts, the same extension procedures apply to intelligencers on a sole representative visa as any other holder of the sole rep via.

Still, news agency or broadcasting association, you would be eligible to apply for an extension of your visa, If you're formerly in the UK as either a representative of an overseas business or an hand of an overseas review.

You would need to give substantiation that

- you are still working for the same employer
- you 're still working to establish the company's first presence in the UK
- your employer's top place of business is still outside the UK

Any dependents who have joined you in the UK can also apply with you at the same time for an extension.
