

Casement Windows v/s Sliding Sash Windows: Which One To Choose?

Just like almost all the other things, even windows tend to come in different shapes and sizes. Sure, they might be tailored to your preferred specifications, but the real complexity is in their functionality and style.

If you are not a homeowner then you didn't have to give this much thought, but if you do own a house then the kind of windows you install matters a lot, to the overall look of your house and your own personality as a house owner. After all, there is hardly any sense in installing new doors and windows if none of them would add to your house's value. This is why it is important that you make your investment work for you too.

In this blog, we will talk about windows, particularly about a couple of the most popular styles these days. Casement windows and sliding sash windows! Both of these windows have advantages of their own, which is why we are here to help you come to a decision.

Casement windows

You can usually distinguish casement windows from the rest with the help of the two or more hinges that are attached to their sides. This allows these windows to open in each direction, inwards as well as outwards. Apart from that, casement windows are well-known for their versatility as they are available in a wide range of materials, from timber and oak to modern UPVC.

Casement windows are particularly a great choice for summer months as they can let a lot of natural sunlight indoor. They have the tendency to open really wide and that too with a lot of ease. All in all, if you install casement windows with the right and appropriate frame, you can add a lot of charm and character to your entire house.

Sliding sash windows

Sliding sash windows, unlike casement windows, are devoid of any hinges whatsoever. Sliding sash windows, as the name suggests, open with a sliding mechanism instead. Depending on where they are installed and on your preference, these windows might slide side to side, upwards, or downwards. Moreover, sliding sash windows might also be double or triple glazed in order to make them even more energy efficient. But do you know what the best part of installing a sliding sash window is? It is the level of control that you get when opening and closing the window, something you would not find in most of the other kinds of windows available in the market. With these windows, you can even keep them slightly ajar and lock them into place. What this does is, it allows a draft to come through while keeping your indoors nice and safe.

As mentioned earlier, casement windows and sliding sash windows have advantages of their own, and now that you have learned about those benefits in detail, you can make a well-informed decision. You should weigh in all your requirements and expectations, and make the right choice for yourself and your property.
