

Apartment living pros and cons

Security, convenience, low maintenance and extra features such as a pool, make apartment living attractive to buyers and tenants alike. Living in an apartment is becoming an increasingly popular choice for everyone. Apartment blocks range from small complexes with two or so dwellings to huge high-rise buildings containing hundreds or thousands of units. Regardless of the size you choose, you'll always be living in close proximity to your neighbours and likely sharing the building's facilities.

Generally speaking, apartments are more affordable to buy than houses. Many apartment blocks offer a range of shared facilities, such as a pool, gym or tennis court, as well as communal spaces like barbeque areas, lawns and gardens, and function rooms. Some even provide childcare, a cinema or hold events.

There are rarely individual gardens or lawns to take care of when living in an apartment, making them easier to maintain. Many apartment complexes have greenery in the shared spaces which are maintained as part of strata. Other parts of the complex such as the gym or pool are often cleaned, repaired and maintained by building management so you can enjoy the benefits without the responsibilities you would usually have in a house.

While security measures do differ between apartment complexes, a lot of buildings have security doors, cameras, and secure garages. The more expensive apartments can also have a concierge or door-man services for extra security. You're also in close proximity to your neighbours and if you live above the ground floor it's typically harder for thieves to break-in.
