Things Students Learn in Laboratory Settings

Candidates in a laboratory setting will know the skills required to perform nursing care. Such skills include calculation of intake and output, measuring blood pressure, preparing hospital beds, application of personalized protective devices, measuring weight and height, washing hands, and similar others. Students have to practice such skills on one another based on the supervision of their instructors. The lab setting even helps students to adopt a hands-on approach to learning skills before attending the clinical part of the program.

Things to Learn in Clinical Settings

Candidates in a clinical setting will apply their knowledge and skills in real patient settings. During this period, they have to take care of the residents belonging to nursing homes in the local area. Besides, every candidate must apply their skills to get competency approval from their instructors in every skill.
