

Restream: How to Stream to Multiple Platforms?

When you start streaming, you probably wonder which platform you should start on, in order to maximize your chances of being seen. It is with the aim of allowing streamers to broadcast on several platforms simultaneously that Restream was created.

To stream to multiple platforms simultaneously, you can use Restream. You will need to have an account on the targeted platforms, in order to allow Restream to provide you with a bundled streaming key. You can then enter the latter in your streaming software, and start your simultaneous broadcast.

The use of Restream is rather simple although it is equipped with many features, and one of them offers you the possibility of scheduling replays, on several platforms.

However, it is not advisable to use Restream in all situations, and we explain why in the rest of the article.

In addition, you will be able to respond to your 2 communities thanks to the group chat system. This tool has several advantages, such as being able to compare the success of your content. Then, you can decide to orient yourself towards the platform of your choice. It can also allow you to gain visibility more quickly, in order to boost traffic on your social networks, for example.

However, if the use of Restream does not pose a problem at first, it may be wise to take note of some restrictions imposed by certain platforms, in particular when you sign a contract with one of them.

Using Restream as a Twitch or Youtube Partner?

When you sign a contract allowing you to become a “Twitch partner”, you agree to apply a 24-hour exclusivity clause for all your content.

In other words, broadcasting on platforms other than Twitch when you have “Partner” status is prohibited by your contract. However, Restream offers several essential features for streamers wishing to gain visibility, and those, regardless of their status.
