

How Are Care Coordination Programs In New York Making A Difference In Health Care?

Just like in other parts of the USA, programs on care coordination in New York aid to improve the overall outcome of healthcare. They also aim to help cut down on the costs of treatment, as well as improve patient experience. Different Care coordination programs New York City try to achieve it through community services, as well as by participating in various social and medical services. Here's a briefing on the various ways they work.

The Basics -

As a very crucial part of care coordination in East Harlem primary care, patient assessment allows the volunteers to locate patients with complex medical needs. A thorough assessment also helps to identify the individuals who could use advanced healthcare services to heal. With such high-risk patients sorted out, the caregiving volunteers can chalk out a care plan. It would not only cater to the patient's specific needs but would also be a highly personalized plan.

The treatment line would address behavioral, social, and medical needs. In the course of treatment, the patients can also come with close contact with the available community resources, as well as providers and services. It would also involve regular follow-ups and strict monitoring to ensure adherence to the planned care.

Various Initiatives and Programs -

There are many popular Care coordination programs New York City that establishments like East Harlem primary care pursue. One of them includes Health Homes or HH, which provide comprehensive care programs, especially for Medicaid recipients. It particularly helps those suffering from chronic conditions. Again, the Care Coordination Program (CCP) concentrates more on Medicaid beneficiaries who have complex and critical health needs. Medicaid Managed Care (MMC), on the other hand, adds care coordination alongside its managed care plan. Another important program under care coordination is the Delivery System Reform Incentive Payment, or the DSRIP, which involves collaborations at the community level for health care.

Threats and Benefits -

Various initiatives that pivot Care coordination programs New York City are gaining rapid popularity. Though these initiatives are primarily grant-based and often require funding to continue, their approach to overall health care has evidently increased the potential of disease management and prevention. As a result, the overall health outcome has improved within a short time span.