

Politicians and Charities Against Win's New York Casino Plan

Las Vegas Sands isn't the only company struggling with New York casino plans. Politicians representing Manhattan's West Side are now also opposing plans by the related course to build a win-branded casino hotel in the High Line area.

The property will add the game to the high line

The planned property will cost around $12 billion to build and is expected to receive approval. Once Wynn secures one of the three state casino licenses, the new property will have three towers, including one named after the operator.

However, not everyone is involved in the plan, as some people believe that the new property will harm the community. Certain politicians, including lawmaker Tony Simone, have spoken out against the plan.

Simone will be one of six board members to decide the fate of the three state casino licenses, which will be a major challenge to casino planning.

In any case, the officials hope to reach a compromise that can be agreed upon with each other. The officials stressed that they have met with High Line representatives several times and have made many meaningful revisions while solving various problems.

Why do people oppose the new casino hotel?

A nonprofit organization called Protect the High Line is trying to challenge plans for win-branded properties, arguing that it will disrupt the view and something that could be used as a residential home will happen.

According to the Protect the High Line, the attraction of the area lies in its park space and elevation, which allows visitors to enjoy the view of the unhindered Manhattan skyline. The claim was repeated by Representative Deborah Glick, who agreed that more towers would negatively impact the area.

However, Manhattan Community Board 4 was concerned about the potential negative impact of real estate on housing in the area.

As mentioned, Wynn properties aren't the only ones facing opposition. Locals have also raised a range of concerns about Wynn's other casino plans. While some have suggested that new casino properties could cause gambling problems to surge, others have cited transportation and housing-related issues as their main concerns.

In another piece of news, politicians recently criticized the lack of new tribal game compacts.
