Because organic products are made using conventional farming practices, no pesticides or other chemicals are utilized in their production. The most productive crop requires a lot of labor to grow. Because producing organic food requires more work and farmers cannot produce enough of a single item to offset costs overall, production costs are typically higher. Even tiny quantities of organic food result in increased expenses since they must be divided after harvesting for processing and shipping. Additionally, organic farmers are required to run their businesses in a way that encourages biodiversity and benefits the environment. The meal will taste better since there are no preservatives. Natural farming demands that farmers manage their operations in a way that promotes biodiversity and limits the use of chemical pesticides, many of which are particularly hazardous to bees and can stay in the environment.
