What Does the Term "Hypomergenic" Mean?

Merriam-Webster defines hypoallergenic as “having little likelihood of causing an allergic response.”

It is important to remember that individual reactions vary. An substance that one dog tolerates well can cause your dog to have an adverse reaction. Since the term "hypoallergenic" is ambiguous, you must be aware of your dog's allergies in order to choose a product that is precisely hypoallergenic for him.

The best way to identify food allergies in dogs is to consult with your vet and begin a food trial. You will need to find food that does not contain any of the potential allergens that might be causing a reaction. Feed your dog this food for 8 to 12 weeks and pay close attention to any signs of the allergy reappearing. If there are no signs of the allergy, you can begin to introduce common allergens one at a time until you identify the problem ingredient.

Once you identify your dog's allergen, simply avoid it in the future. When shopping for dog food and treats, check the list of ingredients for that allergen.

What to Look for in Hypoallergenic Dog Treat Ingredients

One of the most prevalent types of allergies or hypersensitivities in dogs, according to the VCA, is food allergies or intolerances. Dogs can be allergic to all sorts of things- from the environment, they live in, to the food they eat.

When a dog has an allergy, his immune system reacts excessively and begins to produce antibodies against substances that the body would typically be able to handle. This can lead to all sorts of problems for the dog, from skin irritations to gastrointestinal issues.

A veterinarian on Rover's Dog People Panel, says that the most common trigger of allergies is typically the primary protein in the diet. These are things like chicken, beef, and pork—which makes this a good place to start your investigation if you think your dog may have an allergy.

When it comes to dog treats, meat should still be one of the main ingredients. In fact, it's even better if the treat contains a novel animal protein like venison, duck, or turkey. As for carbohydrates, make sure they're coming from nutritious and digestible sources such as sweet potatoes and peas.

Of course, every dog's stomach is a little different. But there are some products that seem to work especially well for sensitive ones. Here are our favorites—the best hypoallergenic dog treats on the market.
