

Cheap Flight Hacks You NEED to Know

Tempted by thoughts of a sun-drenched About Hotels Corners respite from the everyday? Many of us find ourselves often lost in wanderlust (wanderlost?), and too many seldom turn those reveries into realities. That's because most people believe that you need a trust fund—or a hefty savings account—to travel the world.

But, contrary to popular belief, you don't need an impressive number in the bank to traverse the globe. You can see the world for next to nothing if you know where and how to look for the flights and airfare deals that most people don't even know exist.

If you play your cards right, you could save yourself thousands of dollars. You could travel the world for the cost of that coffee you've been mindlessly sipping on, while staring off into space thinking about far off destinations this whole time. From digging up error fares to using hidden-city ticketing, there are a number of cheap flight hacks that make it easy enough to be your own stealthy travel agent.

As long as you know what you're doing.

Table of Contents show

1. Search for Error Fares First

Error fares are an avid traveler's best friend, and Scott's Cheap Flights is probably the most well known resource to find them. That's because it offers up some of the best flight deals. We'll get to that, but first you should know what an error fare exactly is—and it's exactly what it sounds like: incorrect.

Here's the thing: People make typos like typing in wrong numbers, and forget to add charges like taxes charges and fees to flights. Computers can also glitch. The result: a usually valid flight deal that never intended to be a flight deal.

Of course, there's a catch. Some airlines won't honor the deal but, instead, will cancel your flights and refund you. Others, however, will bite the bullet, honor their mistake, and allow you to keep your flight ticket for whatever little money you paid for it. You could score some seriously cheap international flights this way.