One hundred twenty-eight of the world's best cyclists from 31 countries are less than a day away from attacking the Colorado landscape to see who'll survive the altitude and be crowned the 2013 USA Pro Challenge overall winner.

Since his announcement that he would be joining the field, 2013 Tour de France winner Chris Froome jumped to the head of the pack. If his performance at the Tour is any indication, he could be tough to beat. But how will he handle the altitude? This is the first Pro Challenge for Froome and his No. 1 ranked Sky Procycling Team.

In an interview with the Summit Daily, 12-year professional cycling journalist and editor of Velo Magazine Neal Rogers posed another question regarding Froome: "Has he been celebrating, or has he been training?"

He followed that by saying, "If he is in any kind of shape, he's going to be the guy to beat."

Rogers also questioned the Sky team's strategy. Froome could work to help his Australian teammate Richie Porte earn the win and return the favor for Porte's efforts in the Tour. "He (Porte) was Chris Froome's right-hand man in the Tour," Rogers said.

Another top contender is Colorado's own Tom Danielson, who was injured in the Tour de France this year but is fresh off a win in the Tour of Utah. The Boulder native showed he's recovered from his Tour injury and is ready to race at altitude with his performance just over a week ago in Utah.
