

Gulf Coast, Hollywood Casino, Mississippi

Hollywood Casino in Mississippi The Gulf Coast is another great place if you're wondering where it's best to go to avoid the zombie era. The building is a fortified place with its proximity to the waterfront in St. Louis Bay. As for the actual size of the Hollywood casino, although the venue is not too spacious and the entrances and exits are limited, there may be a few problems on the first floor because there are many windows inside.

However, heavy gaming gear can be moved to prevent zombies from passing by. Ideally, survivors want to take advantage of good views of the terrain to allow zombies to stop even further away. Hollywood casinos are also very close to industrial facilities, such as shipyards and factories, which means they can attract additional fortifications. Gulf communities are also known to be very strict, and supermarkets have enough food to ensure an immediate stockpile of food and resources. The coast also allows fishing and water resource development, and the Gulf of St. Louis is directly connected to the Gulf of Mexico, which provides escape routes and fishing resources. The downside of Hollywood Casino Gulf Coast, of course, is that if nearby cities are overwhelmed and resources become harder to come by, they can be exposed too much. Agriculture is also not a good way to go because there are so many vulnerable areas, but fishing seems to always exist. As an escape route, survivors can even build a fleet of ships, and everything seems possible given the very low population density of these areas.
