Liquor Stores in th United States.

Some states in the United States operate their own retailers for the sale of some kinds of alcohol.

The Twenty-first Amendment of the Constitution allows states to manage the sale and consumption of alcoholic beverages. The majority of the U.S. states have laws specifying which alcohol consumption must be sold in specialty liquor stores and which can be sold in other venues.

In 18 alcoholic beverage control states, the specialty liquor stores are managed exclusively by the local government.

In Alabama, Connecticut, Georgia, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, liquor stores can also be known as package stores, because purchased liquor have to be packaged in sealed bottles or other containers when it is obtained from the store.

In five states (Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, Oklahoma, and Utah), only low-point beer could possibly be sold in supermarkets or gas stations.

In California, Louisiana, Missouri, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wisconsin all alcohol based drinks can be sold practically anywhere, including drug stores and service stations.

In Washington state, all beer and wine can be bought in specialty stores, food markets, convenience stores, department stores, taverns, along with other locations.
