Visiting Cumberland Island is an out-of-the-ordinary experience no matter how you obtain there; but kayaking to Cumberland Island is the absolute most exciting and spectacular way to take pleasure from this jewel of a barrier island. Though kayaking to Cumberland Island is not really a trip for novices, experienced kayakers with self-rescue skills needs to have no issue crossing the Cumberland Sound or Intracoastal Waterway and making their way back from a day on the island. Here are a few day-trips for experienced kayakers who would like to spend a day on Cumberland Island, but don't want to take the ferry.the 8 cumberland condos Toronto

From Crooked River State park to Plum Orchard on Cumberland Island: Put-in at the Crooked River State Park boat ramp at high-tide, or at the least before the midst of the out-going tide - about 3-hours after high tide. You will undoubtedly be heading East with a very good out-flowing current taking you to Cumberland Island. Only a little greater than a mile from the put-in, the Crooked River makes a nearly 90-degree turn to the Southeast and then back to the East after about another mile. After the turn to the Southeast, stay along the left side and try to find the big left turn. As you continue out the Crooked River, you'll be heading East toward the tree line on Cumberland Island and will undoubtedly be in a position to see the white-structures at Plum Orchard.

The trip from Crooked River State Park to Plum Orchard is approximately 6-miles and should take significantly less than 2-hours. Ideally, you should try to find an earlier enough high tide to obtain you to the island and give you plenty of time for sightseeing before being forced to head back. You certainly desire to be back at Crooked River by high tide - or by dark if high tide is after dark. Bear in mind that even strong, experienced paddlers may find it impossible to really make the trip against the strong tidal currents in the Crooked River.check over here

From St. Mary's to the entrance of Beach Creek: Put-in at the boat ramp at the St. Marys waterfront at or after high tide to produce this 4-mile trip out the St. Marys River and throughout the Cumberland Sound to the area near the entrance to Beach Creek. The outgoing tidal currents in the Cumberland Sound will undoubtedly be pushing you toward Amelia Island and the Atlantic Ocean, so it is in addition crucial to monitor your ferry angle as you cross the Sound. Beachcombing on this element of Cumberland Island usually produces pocketfuls of shark teeth and frequent wild horse sightings. There's no navigation to the trip; just take the falling tide out from the St. Marys River and cross the Cumberland Sound to achieve Cumberland Island. Enjoy Cumberland until after low-tide and then take the incoming tide, or flood tide, back to St. Marys. This trip should take about an hour to an hour and a half each way according to winds and paddling speed.

From Amelia Island to the South end of Cumberland Island: The shortest, but most treacherous trip to Cumberland Island is from the boat ramp at the north end of Amelia Island straight across to the south tip of Cumberland. This route crosses the Intracoastal Waterway (ICW) and the Cumberland Sound in a place with abundant, heavy boat traffic, so safety and awareness of details is important. The crossing itself is less when compared to a mile; but this can be a mile of potentially BIG, scary water. Go to Cumberland Island on an incoming tide and go back to Amelia Island on an outgoing tide. Two important factors to remember are: First, there are extremely swift currents in this part of the Cumberland Sound and ICW; and, second, the wind and weather will change while you're on the island - making surface conditions for the return trip unpredictable. This is not at all a visit for novices and self-rescue skills are a must.

Prior to going, call a local outfitter and check tide times and wind and weather forecasts. Also, be sure you have plenty of drinking tap water and something to eat in addition to having appropriate gear and clothing for the trip. All of the year, sunscreen and insect repellent top the set of things to remember for the trip. There's a $4.00 fee for landing on Cumberland Island which can be paid at the Cumberland Island National Seashore Headquarters in St. Marys, or at one of many honor boxes situated on the island. With slightly preparation, a day-trip to Cumberland Island is a lot of adventure and fun for a very affordable price!
